The serene river cruise with a lovely view of the vast mangrove plantation along the way with an occasional glimpse of migratory birds is an exceptional moment one must experience. It is believed that with the ongoing preservation and development of the area, Bakawan will eventually become a habitat for more birds as well as marine species. To explore the place, one needs a boat ride that would traverse along Pudoc river leading to a bare island akin to a sandbar to which locals have been referring to since time immemorial as the "Puraw nga Kadaratan" or white sand. The 120,368 hectares of land in the two barangays is home to twelve (12) species of mangrove which are mostly located along the coast.	16.50531, 120.31254

In old maps dating to the 19th century, the river is referred to as the Balili River. However, in the municipality, people know it as the Bauang River. The Bauang River measures about 8.5km in length. The width of the river measures 50m (est.) at the eastern boundary of the town; 167m (est.) across the ruins of the old PNR railway; 218m (est.) across the width of the bridge; 455m (est.) across the estuary at Pugo and 111m (est.) across the estuary at Pudoc. It runs across barangays Pugo, Central East, Acao and Ballay on its north and barangays Pudoc, Parian Este, Nagreccan, Calumbaya, Boy-utan, Bucayab and Cabalangyan on its south. The river splits into two as it connects to the West Philippine Sea, forming a landmass in between called an islet or delta that is reportedly inhabited by about 50 informal settlers.	16.51756, 120.33527

It was purportedly planted in 1892 by the forebears of Don Vidal Wenceslao, former owner of the lot. This gigantic centennial acacia tree looks like a large umbrella which practically covers most of the school ground with its large roots sprawling within approximately a 20-meter radius. Its giant branches are covered with moss, fern, and other aerial plants giving it a green complexion instead of the usual brown and dark gray color. It is a silent witness of war, peace, and innovations that took place in the area. It is continually adding up years with its existence.	16.45276, 120.33309
